

Do you see it as your role to engage and educate decision-makers regarding issues of race and oppression? Why or why not?

Yes. Social workers are responsible for protecting vulnerable members of society and helping them to achieve their rights. Race and oppression are issues that affects the quality of life for the disadvantaged groups in the society. It is essential to educate the members of society on the dangers of racism and oppression and enlighten them on the importance of promoting equality. Engaging and educating decision-makers on race and oppression will help promote a better quality of living in society.

Are you afraid of challenging systems and decision-makers? If so, what small steps can you take to strategize with others and overcome your fear? Who would you consider recruiting as allies in challenging the status quo?

I am not afraid of challenging the system because it is part of the duty of a social worker to enhance equality in the community. Challenging the system will help promote the achievement of human rights, which is one of the fundamentals of the constitution. In the challenging process, I would ensure that I recruit members of the society and leaders devoted to promoting human dignity. The public members will help hold protests that will create awareness of the need to change the system and eliminate all forms of oppression. The leaders will help express their views on changing the system in the parliament, which is essential in amending the laws. Collaboration with the community and leaders will effectively achieve the desired change and adopt a system that prioritizes equality.